For The Times' Children Just Before It's Bedtime

A BRAVE LITTLE COWARD.

IT was very warm and cosy in the big sitting-room of the old farmhouse on the hill. And the two boys who sat in the circle of light before the open fire were enjoying themselves immensely. For each was curled up in a soft chair with a book, and on the table a plate of red apples shone in the glow of the lamp.

The oldest lad, Hal, was a tall, dark, strong boy. But Ranny, the other, seemed rather frail with his blonde hair and slender finger. Randolph Reginald Burton was his full name, but everyone called him simply Ranny.

"Gee, but this is a jolly book," exclaimed Hal, with his mouth full of apple. "It's a dandy! Just full of knights and dragons and soldiers. It must have been lots of fun to ride about the country fighting giants and robbers and such things in olden days."

Ranny looked up quickly and caught a pair of smiling eyes glancing at both boys.

"It was all right in those days for men to prance around in armor to help them in distress," said the owner of the laughing eyes. Aunt Ada, "but there are evils to fight today and just as brave for you boys to do. You have your own bad temper to conquer and many wrongs in the world."

"Well, it's swords and guns for me," blurted Hal. "Any man that has any courage ought to be ready to do anything that comes to hand. I hate a coward."

Ranny flushed and tears came into his eyes. He was always calling him "cowardly boy and coward," and it wounded the boy deeply. For he was not of a robust nature and had no liking for bullying the other boys, like Hal did, and the old boy thought any one who was not blowing and bluffing was a coward.

"It is not those that talk the biggest," said Aunt Ada, "that are the bravest, or who really do the things that are great in this world. It is the one that comes in last in a trial is the one that does the least."

Ranny was glad to hear this from his kind aunt, for he had always worried him to think he might at heart be a coward. "I don't like being called a coward," he said to himself, "but I hate to think that Aunt Ada says is true, and that when the time comes I may make good."

Presently all went to bed and the house grew still as a mouse. Hal about midnight there were sounds of groans from Sarah's room. Sarah was the colored cook, and both boys were fond of her gingerbread and of her good-natured ways.

"Sarah is sick," said Aunt Ada, coming into the boys' room. "I hate to ask you, but Hal, you will have to ride for the doctor."

"Not much," replied Hal, who was set to receive the reports of officers and appoint new ones.

A hop will be given by the officers and ladies of the post at Fort Myer Monday evening.

Mme. Christian Hauke has sent out cards for a dinner on March 3.

The Sons of the American Revolution will meet at Rauscher's at 12 o'clock tomorrow for their annual luncheon, and fish and laze. "It's too cold out. She will be all right in a little while." "I think I can get him," said Ranny, quietly slipping into his clothes. "Tell Sarah I will have Dr. Brown here just as soon as Selim can travel five miles." And in another minute Ranny was in the stable, saddling the bay colt.

There was a clatter of galloping hoofs on the hard, frozen pile and Selim with Ranny on his back, swept out of sight. Like the wind the colt raced over the road, his hoofs beating the sleeping farmers. "Selim's stuck his nose along the bridge, over the hill and down the long forest path. The cold rain almost numbed his eyes, but he didn't care. He was a brave little fellow, and he was going to save Ranny from the horse's mad. Mile after mile passed in the mad gallop, and at last he rolled off the panting colt before Dr. Brown's door.

"Why, child, you are almost dead yourself," cried the doctor, as he dragged the numbered boy into a warm room. "Here, drink this and then stay here tonight. I will run over in my auto to see Sarah. So the doctor put Selim in the stable, tucked Ranny in bed, then saved his automobile over to the house, five miles away.

He found Sarah quite ill, but after a while she felt better, fell asleep and the doctor came home to breakfast.

It was well you came for me last night," said Dr. Brown to Ranny at the table. "I fear Sarah would not have gotten well if no one had come for me."

"I hope you are better now," said the doctor, "but you must stay here tonight, and a very grateful Sarah it was that greeted him when the aunt and the boys sat again around the fire. Hal took up the same book about soldiers, fighting, and knights.

"Well, Hal," she laughed, "you remember what I said last night. What did you do when the trial came? You curled up in your warm bed. I think you will find all through life that the kindest and bravest are not the brawniest, and that a boy may be far braver than you, when you think him a coward."

Frances Starr Tells Julia Murdock Why Girls Rave About Actresses

"Too Much Nietzsche and Schopenhauer" Is Blamed for Suicide of Woman.

TOO much Nietzsche and Schopenhauer and not enough of the wholesome, natural life that a growing girl demands," is the explanation given by Miss Frances Starr for the sad suicide of the young girl whose unexplained fascination for an actress led her to take her life a few days ago.

"It seems to have become a habit for young girls to select some particular woman in the public eye—usually an actress—and to place her upon a sort of pedestal and worship her," Miss Starr continued. "Usually this sort of worship is a silly and innocent infatuation from which the girl recovers within a few months, but if the girl happens to be possessed of a morbid temperament, the result of such a delirium may prove disastrous as in the case of that young Pennsylvania girl."

Actress Gets Gift

From Youthful Admirer.

Miss Starr was seated in her dressing room at the National Theater, wiping the make-up from her face, while her maid replaced the garments of Dorothy, which she had worn in the last act of "The Case of Becky," for a conventional street gown of black broadcloth. On the star's dressing table there lay a huge bunch of pink sweet peas, tied with pink satin ribbon, to which was pinned several dollars, and as she pointed to the bunch of fragrant flowers, she said "here's an example of what we were just talking about."

She unfolded the envelope and extracted therefrom a note, which, as she had surmised, was from a young girl who had written a gushing letter, full of adjectives, to Miss Starr. This girl had never been any nearer to Miss Starr than the distance that separates the one-dollar seats from the stage, but she probably felt that this had given her the right to send a letter to the actress, and to bestow flowers upon her.

"Possibly this particular young girl has saved up her allowance money for a week to purchase those flowers, and economized and scrimped to buy a ticket for the matinee," said Miss Starr, "and here am I placed in a position where I must either be rude, and pay no attention to the letter and the gift, or I must write her a letter of thanks, and by that means encourage her to go farther in her silly infatuation."

"This girl, like hundreds of others of her kind, is wisely gazing into a life she knows absolutely nothing about. She just happens to have chosen me for her object of adoration. Probably her room mate worships Ethel Barrymore, and the girl next to her has an equally silly affair over Billie Burke. It's a sort of sentimental disease, from which they recover, but which even in its milder form is undesirable, and in its more violent form may prove dangerous, as in the case of the girl in Philadelphia."

I asked Miss Starr whether this malady affected many young girls.

Many Girls Victims

Of Strange Infatuation.

"You'd be surprised to know of the large number of letters I receive," she answered. "There isn't a day that I do not receive from one to five, sometimes more. All of them seem to come from well educated, well-to-do girls, if I may judge from the way they are written, and the stationery used. Some of them are gushy to the point of being disgusting, some of them merely pleasant little missives, and many of them simply ask for photographs, or sentiments."

"Very frequently some stage-struck miss, who has recited 'Curfew' or some other favorite of the amateur, and who has been told by her friends and family that she will some day rival Bernhardt, writes and asks me to give her a letter to some New York manager, for she feels sure that all she needs in order to secure a Broadway engagement is that little scribble from me.

"Of course it is out of the question for me to assume the responsibility of advising any girl as to her future career, and, on the other hand, I do not feel that I have the right to discourage her in her ambition."

"Some of the letters I receive ask me for my picture, or some other keepsake, a handkerchief, or some of my cast-off clothes. The queer thing about these letters is that many of them, I might say the greater majority of them, come from little country places where I have never played, and where they know of me only through magazine or newspaper notices."

"For instance, there is a girl out in Wyoming who has written me constantly

ly for about two years. She has sent me snapshots of herself on horseback, in front of her father's ranch, and in every conceivable pose. I have not answered any of her letters, but this fact does not daunt the young thing. She just keeps on writing, with sublime indifference to the fact that I do not pay any attention to her letters.

"Very often some real nice girl goes home after writing one of my performances and writes me a letter, telling me how much she has enjoyed the pleasure I have given her, and once in a while some one sends me a criticism of myself. I guess, after all, these are the letters I like best—the ones that show that my work has received attention. I receive requests without number for contributions to 'causes' and movements, and dozens of girls write offering to be my maid or my secretary without remuneration."

"There is much more that I might say, but it would all be in the same vein. I hope you will make clear to me that my work has received interest in my work that I appreciate the courteous notes I receive, and that if I am slow in responding, it is because of pressure of many things, rather than from lack of gratitude."
